Background: Among all racial and ethnic groups in the USA, African Americans bear the greatest burden from tobacco related disease. The tobacco industry has been highly influential in the African American community for decades, providing funding and other resources to community leaders and emphasising publicly its support for civil rights causes and groups, while ignoring the negative health effects of its products on those it claims to support. However, the industry's private business reasons for providing such support were unknown.

Objective: To understand how and for what purposes the tobacco industry sought to establish and maintain relationships with African American leaders.

Methods: Review and analysis of over 700 previously secret internal tobacco industry documents available on the internet.

Results: The tobacco industry established relationships with virtually every African American leadership organisation and built longstanding social connections with the community, for three specific business reasons: to increase African American tobacco use, to use African Americans as a frontline force to defend industry policy positions, and to defuse tobacco control efforts.

Conclusion: As the tobacco industry expands its global reach, public health advocates should anticipate similar industry efforts to exploit the vulnerabilities of marginalised groups. The apparent generosity, inclusion, and friendship proffered by the industry extract a price from groups in the health of their members. Helping groups anticipate such efforts, confront industry co-optation, and understand the hidden costs of accepting tobacco industry largesse should be part of worldwide tobacco control efforts.

African Americans have struggled for decades to obtain civil rights and combat discrimination. In the process, they forged ties with organisations—including tobacco companies—that offered resources when allies were few. The tobacco industry's longstanding links with African American leaders could be interpreted as representing a laudable commitment to civil rights causes, as the industry claims. However, an alternative interpretation is that these relationships served the industry by helping to keep African Americans engaged as tobacco consumers and silent as opponents. Whatever the intended purposes, the normalised, pervasive presence of tobacco within African American communities has had deadly effects.

Compared to other racial/ethnic groups, African Americans bear the greatest health burden from preventable tobacco related diseases,¹⁻⁵ which kill approximately 45 000 African Americans yearly.^{4,6} Because of this disparity, it is critical to understand how the tobacco industry operates within African American communities, and for what purposes. Although some have suggested that African Americans lack interest in tobacco control,⁷ an increasing number of tobacco control programmes are being implemented by and for black communities.^{1,4} Some African American leaders have begun speaking out against industry targeting of people of colour.^{4,8} This paper analyses internal tobacco industry documents to show how deeply embedded ties between African American leadership groups and the industry normalise tobacco use and industry presence, influence African American voices in the tobacco control policy process, and obstruct or weaken tobacco control efforts.

METHODS

As a result of the 1998 Master Settlement Agreement in the USA, over 40 million pages of internal tobacco industry documents are electronically accessible through tobacco company websites, the University of California, San Francisco's Legacy Tobacco Documents Library,⁹ and others.¹⁰⁻¹² Documents for this paper were retrieved between February 2001 and April 2002 primarily from the Philip Morris, RJ Reynolds, Brown and Williamson, Lorillard, and Tobacco Institute websites.¹³⁻¹⁷ Additional documents were retrieved from the Minnesota Tobacco Document Depository.

Approximately 700 internal tobacco industry documents pertaining to African American leadership groups were collected and reviewed. Several search strategies were utilised.¹¹ We searched for identifiers (for example, "black", "African American"), organisation names (for example, "NAACP"), and names of leaders using a "snowball" approach. Also, we reviewed relevant secondary data sources including newspaper and journal articles. EndNote¹⁸ software was utilised for data management. Data were analysed to categorise the tobacco industry's practices and goals in establishing influence with African American leaders.

RESULTS

Background: the tobacco industry and black leadership

In the 1930s, about half of all persons employed in manufacturing positions in the tobacco industry were African American.¹⁹ Philip Morris claims to be the first tobacco company to hire black salesmen,²⁰ while RJ Reynolds (RJR) was the first in the industry to desegregate its facilities and integrate production lines.^{4 19} Yet, most blacks were still denied better paying jobs and typically worked in unpleasant conditions.²¹ During the 1940s, however, PM realised that “the black community [made] up a distinct market”²² and began advertising in black publications.²⁰ Other tobacco companies followed.¹ Henceforth, African Americans were regarded not only as industry labour, but also as potential tobacco consumers.⁴

According to a PM chronology of its corporate involvement in the black community,²² tobacco executives George Weissman and Joseph Cullman, both of whom served as PM board chairman and CEO, had established relationships with black organisations by the 1950s. Weissman volunteered with the National Urban League (NUL) and Cullman was an “active supporter of Urban League, NAACP [National Association for the Advancement of Colored People], UNCF [United Negro College Fund], etc.” Cullman later joined the NUL board of directors. By the time they became PM’s top executives, Weissman and Cullman had been forming ties within the black community for over 30 years.

The industry used its relationships with black organisations to recruit African Americans into its workforce,²² which, in turn, intensified tobacco industry presence in black organisations. Many individuals hired by the industry were influential within the African American community.³ For example, in the 1940s, PM hired Herb Wright, a former youth director for the NAACP.²³ Wright worked for PM for 30 years,²⁴ expanding PM’s reach into black colleges²⁰ and black organisations.²²

Other examples of the intertwined relationships between black leaders and the tobacco industry include Vernon Jordan, former executive director of NUL and former board member of RJR; Margaret Young, widow of former NUL executive director Whitney Young, Jr, and board member of PM;²² Ivor W Hughes, chairman/CEO of Brown and Williamson Tobacco Company and board member of NUL;²⁵ Raymond Pritchard, another chairman/CEO of Brown and Williamson, NUL board member, and advisor to Opportunities Industrialisation Centers of America, a black economic development programme;²⁶ and Hugh Cullman, PM chairman/CEO and chairman of the board of the United Negro College Fund.^{27 28} The tobacco industry worked to retain “close, continuing relationships” with virtually every major African American leadership group²⁹ (table 1).

Establishing and normalising a tobacco presence

Black opinion leaders were researched and sought out by the tobacco industry in order to enhance corporate image and improve market position within African American communities.³⁰⁻³² One industry image building strategy was to establish an association with the public service efforts of African American organisations. For example, industry documents describe a PM sponsored symposium focusing on blacks and their civil rights struggle. The 1989 symposium was a collaboration between the Joint Center for Political and Economic Studies (an African American public policy “think tank”) and the Smithsonian Institution. To honour Black History Month, eight half-hour programmes were aired on over 200 radio stations in 50 countries.³³ Each opened and closed with credits for PM. When the estimated three million listeners heard the broadcasts, they also heard the tobacco industry associated with African American accomplishments. RJR likewise associated itself with a highly regarded civil rights organisation by placing its corporate logo on billboards promoting NUL’s community service campaigns.³⁴

Tobacco money supported African American civil, educational, social, and political organisations and community leaders elected on local, state and federal levels.^{7 35} (table 1) Support included corporate contributions, business expenses, honoraria, journal ads, and promotional items.³⁶ The amount of support was based on the “importance of [the] organisation to [the] company’s long term goals”.³⁷ In 1989, 70% of PM expenditures to minority organisations went to black groups.³⁶

At annual conferences of African American organisations, the tobacco industry built its positive image by displaying to thousands its largesse. For example, the Congressional Black Caucus Foundation’s Annual Legislative Weekend attracted up to 50 000 of the most influential black leaders in politics, government, business, education, and law.³⁸ Tobacco executives socialised and built support by hosting receptions and dinners at these events.³⁹

At the 1983 NAACP annual convention, for example, Brown and Williamson announced a “fair share agreement” with the NAACP, promising major economic opportunities for blacks and other minorities.

“These efforts are projected to have a positive result of $26 million in purchases from minority vendors in the first fiscal year . . . approximately $4.75 million to minority advertising and marketing services companies . . . approximately 21 percent of the corporate contributions budget [given to organisations which primarily serve minorities].”⁴⁰

However, a 1984 marketing document elucidates the company’s primary motive:

“ . . .the Fair Share agreement with the NAACP, association with a national civil rights organization can be viewed . . .as an endorsement of Brown & Williamson and its products . . . if managed with sensitivity, this association can be linked positively to the minority buying public. Clearly, the sole reason for B&W’s interest in the black and Hispanic communities is the actual and potential sales of B&W products within these communities and the profitability of these sales . . . this relatively small and often tightly knit [minority] community can work to B&W’s marketing advantage, if exploited properly.”⁴¹ [emphasis added]

The industry extracted something in return from organisations that received its money. For example, when the NAACP relocated an office, RJ Reynolds helped fund the move, but also expected the organisation to facilitate publicity:

“One check is in the amount of $30,000 representing our 1987 grant to the NAACP Special Contributions Fund. The second check is in the amount of $25,000 . . .for the relocation of your office . . .it is our understanding that you will provide an appropriate platform . . .that we may make public these grants.”⁴²

Policy influence

The tobacco industry expected its relationship with African American political organisations to achieve political and policy goals.⁴³ The Congressional Black Caucus Foundation (CBCF), the separate fund raising entity that supports the Congressional Black Caucus’s (CBC) political activities,⁴⁴ administers fellowship, internship, and scholarship programmes for aspiring African American leaders. The tobacco industry supported the CBC and CBCF, including at least $125 000 in 1985,⁴⁵ $50 000 in 1986,⁴⁶ and $155 000 in 1993.⁴⁷ Involvement in these programmes provided opportunities for the industry to link with individuals deemed likely to become future policy leaders and eventual allies, as suggested by a 1990 PM memo: “Purpose of [sponsoring] internships: develop an early †C, Corporate/organisational links: documents provide evidence of shared leadership between community organisation and one or more tobacco companies (for example, dual board relationships). E, Economic support: documents provide evidence that one or more tobacco companies or the Tobacco Institute provided economic support for the organisation or its designees. This support may include direct contributions, sponsorships of activities or internships, or covering of other expenses such as travel or office relocation. M, Marketing access: documents provide evidence that the organisation facilitated marketing access to its members for one or more tobacco companies (for example, cigarette sampling allowed at organisation's functions/events). P, Political exchange: documents provide evidence that one or more tobacco companies or the Tobacco Institute has assisted the organisation in political matters (for example, handled press conferences, press releases, assisted with lobbying, linked organisation with allies), or that the organisation has assisted the tobacco industry in its political matters.

relationship with individuals who are likely to wind up in the public policy arena.⁴⁸ The industry also funded internship and scholarship programmes of other important African American organisations, including the National Newspaper Publishers Association.^{49 50}

The industry also sponsored mentoring programmes in order to reach future African American policymakers. For example, RJR participated in the NUL's Black Executive Exchange Program (BEEP).³⁷ Established in 1969, BEEP works with black colleges to connect students with African American executives from industry and government. A 1990 report from an RJR employee suggests that industry policy positions were promoted through BEEP seminars:

"The importance of this seminar went beyond the lectures and symposia . . . [the] influence that representatives from RJR have on the attendees of the seminar should be noted. It was during conversations with small groups and individuals that this influence was most effective. These conversations provided opportunities to present the smoker's rights position to persons intimately involved in smoking/non-smoking policy-making activities within their companies . . ."⁵¹

The industry sought generally to establish relationships with politicians early in their careers.⁵² By showering with attention junior and local politicians who were likely to move on to state and federal offices, the industry sought to enlarge its pool of political allies. A 1991 memo written by an RJR representative working in Ohio illustrates the industry's watchful interest in local African American politicians:

"Barbara [Boyd] . . . Vice-Mayor of Cleveland Heights, Ohio . . . first-ever black elected official . . . co-founder of the Black Women's Political Caucus, President of the Cleveland Heights Democrats, and the Secretary of the Cuyahoga County Democratic Party . . . Barbara is, without a doubt, going places."

"[Cleveland Mayor Mike White:] . . . African-American big city mayor . . . in the process of consolidating his political power . . . it's clear that Mike White can either open or close a number of doors for us."⁵³

Industry generosity was undertaken not merely for goodwill's sake, but because it was a way to ensure support for the industry's policy positions. A 1991 RJR memo provides an example of a political organisation offering to support and defend the industry in exchange for tobacco money. When RJR hosted a dinner reception in honour of the Michigan Black Legislative Caucus (MBLC), members of the caucus asked RJR to contribute to a black owned hospital and Detroit youth organisations.

"[We, RJR] . . . were assured that our support would be welcomed, regardless of the probable criticism of anti-smoking activists. We were further assured that [MBLC] would in turn support us . . . Caucus members assured us that they were willing to be friends of the industry, and pledged their support."⁵⁴

Many other African American organisations that accepted tobacco money have supported the industry by opposing tobacco control legislation.^{46 55} For example, during the second half of the 1980s, the federal government was looking for ways to address its budget deficit. Increasing the federal excise tax on tobacco products was one option. Increasing excise taxes is also an effective way to reduce tobacco use,^{56 57} especially among African Americans.⁵⁸ It has also been demonstrated that higher excise taxes on tobacco products discourage initiation of smoking, particularly among low income youth.⁵⁹ A 1987 PM marketing memo reveals the industry's knowledge of what an excise tax increase could do:

"You may recall . . . that the 1982-83 round of price increases caused two million adults to quit smoking and prevented 600,000 teenagers from starting to smoke. Those teenagers are now 18-21 years old, and since about 70 percent of 18-21 year-olds and 35 percent of older smokers smoke a PM brand, this means that 700,000 of those adult quitters had been PM smokers and 420,000 of the non-smokers would have been PM

smokers . . . [we] don't need to have that happen again."⁶⁰ [emphasis in original]

Although this memo does not address African American smokers specifically, it suggests why the Tobacco Institute had declared in 1984 that preventing any excise tax increase was the industry's highest priority.⁶¹

One of the industry's key strategies for fighting tax increases was to argue that excise taxes were regressive and disproportionately unfair, particularly to minorities.⁶²⁻⁶³ Displaying credible support for this argument led to an intensified effort to pull minority organisations on board.⁶¹ In 1981 the Congressional Black Caucus had proposed an alternative to President Reagan's federal budget.⁶⁴ Although the CBC budget included a tax cut for middle income Americans,⁶⁵ it also contained a 10% increase in the tobacco excise tax.⁶⁶⁻⁶⁷ This alternative budget would have restored most of the funding for social programmes considered vital to the poor, which were proposed for cuts under the Reagan plan.⁶⁸ Yet, in 1984, for undetermined reasons, the CBC's alternative budget opposed increasing tobacco excise taxes.

The tobacco industry sought to leverage the caucus' changed position, as a 1984 document shows:

"The recent (3/30/84) adoption by the Congressional Black Caucus of an alternative budget program which expressly opposes any increase in or extension of cigarette excise taxes . . . can be used to industry advantage . . ."⁶⁹

By June 1985, the industry felt confident that the National Black Caucus of State Legislators (NBCSL) also opposed increasing excise taxes⁷⁰ and therefore would support the industry's position. According to a Tobacco Institute memo, the industry secured further support from other African American organisations:

"Philip Morris staff has reported that the following groups have or will submit statements in support of our position [on the excise tax]: NAACP, National Urban League, National Association of Black County Officials, National Coalition of 100 Black Women, National Black Police Association . . . West Coast Black Publishers Association . . . and the Georgia Association of Black Elected Officials."⁷¹

As part of the industry wide effort, PM distributed to 50 major African American newspapers an op-ed piece apparently authored by James Hargrove, chair of the National Black Police Association,⁷²⁻⁷³ addressing "the inherent unfairness of excise taxes to minorities".⁶² Mr Hargrove, a recipient of tobacco money,⁷²⁻⁷⁴ often defended pro-tobacco issues.⁷⁵⁻⁷⁸

By the end of 1985, Reverend Jesse Jackson, chair of the National Rainbow Coalition, was also attacking excise taxes.⁷⁹ Citing a 1981 economic study, Jackson asserted that "the tobacco tax burden is as much as 10 times greater for Black consumers". It is unclear whether Jackson understood that the study's author, economist V Glenn Chappell, was research director of the Tobacco Tax Council and consultant to the Tobacco Institute and had been affiliated with the industry since at least 1973.⁸⁰⁻⁸²

When Congress announced 1987 public hearings on federal revenue options, the tobacco industry solicited additional support from the National Conference of Black Mayors⁸³⁻⁸⁴ and Opportunities Industrialization Centers of America.⁸⁴ The CBC established a task force to review the impact of excise taxes on the poor, blacks, and other minorities, which issued a 1987 report.⁸⁵ Congressman Mervyn Dymally (Democrat, California), chair of the CBC and a recipient of tobacco money,⁸⁶⁻⁸⁹ presented the report to congressional committees. Echoing industry positions, Dymally argued that federal excise taxes were unfair, regressive, and disproportionately affected low income families, blacks, and other minorities.⁹⁰ Several memos written by Samuel Chilcote, Tobacco Institute president, reveal that the industry took credit for shaping these views:

"Since January [1987] substantial progress has been made in convincing . . . the Congressional Black Caucus . . . that excise tax increases would hurt the poor . . ."⁹¹

The tobacco industry coordinated press conferences and media placements of op-eds to promote Dymally's task force report.

"[Dymally] will conduct a press conference next week to release his report on excise tax regressivity . . . [The Tobacco Institute] is coordinating the press event and coverage . . ."⁹²

"By the end of December [1987], twenty black publications had published op-eds prepared by . . . Dymally opposing increased federal excise taxes. We [the Tobacco Institute] coordinated the project . . ."⁹³

In 1989, the threat of increased excise taxes still existed on Capitol Hill. The tobacco industry maintained its connection with Dymally (who once publicly admitted to voting on behalf of tobacco even when it conflicted with his own views⁹⁴) as a resource to help the industry and its allies kill tax proposals.⁹⁵ Industry spokespersons continued quoting Dymally into at least the early 1990s,⁹⁶⁻⁹⁸ even after he was no longer a member of Congress.

Representative Charles Rangel from New York, another CBC member, has taken tobacco money.⁸⁶⁻⁹⁹⁻¹⁰¹ Despite previously supporting legislation to inform the public of tobacco's dangers (H.R. 4957) and legislation acknowledging that smoking increased cancer mortality for blacks (H.R. 4856),¹⁰² Rangel was a congressional contact for the industry¹⁰³ and thought to be "willing to compromise with the tobacco industry".¹⁰⁴ On the state level, powerful politician Willie Brown, former speaker of the California House and current mayor of San Francisco, was a longtime recipient of tobacco industry contributions who repeatedly used his power to thwart tobacco control measures.¹⁰⁵

The industry also drew on ties with African American leaders to circumvent local tobacco control policies and exploit promotional opportunities. For example, a 1984 RJR sports sponsorship promotional plan for Chicago noted that:

". . . almost all softball league games are played on Park District or Chicago Board of Education grounds. RJR's own policies prohibit sampling on school grounds. In addition . . . Chicago Park District regulations prohibit the sampling of cigarettes on Park District grounds. However, our contacts to [sic] various political representatives . . . lead us to believe we could receive some support/assistance from local black politicians in obtaining permission to sample at these activities."¹⁰⁶

The tobacco industry's presence was not always evident. It often called upon third party "allies" within minority groups to approach black leaders on its behalf.¹⁰⁷ For example, the industry urged the West Coast Black Publishers and the Black Professional Fire Fighters to write to CBC members, asking them to oppose tobacco control legislation¹⁰⁸ and co-sponsor pro-tobacco legislation.¹⁰⁹ When the Tobacco Institute planned to contact the Council of Black Churches for assistance in distributing the industry's booklet "Tobacco: Helping Youth Say No", Benjamin Ruffin, RJR's African American vice president of corporate affairs, warned the Institute that “tobacco people might not be enthusiastically received” by the council.¹¹⁰ Heeding Ruffin’s warning, the Tobacco Institute called upon Norm Hill of the A Philip Randolph Foundation, a black trade union organisation named after the civil rights leader, to meet with the church council. The foundation, also a recipient of tobacco money,¹¹¹ had previously supported the industry’s efforts in opposing excise tax increases.⁹³

Emerging African American resistance

African Americans were not, however, merely passive recipients and industry pawns. Some questioned and challenged industry practices. For example, in 1984 a beneficiary of an industry supported internship programme questioned the distribution of cigarette samples, a common practice at many African American events.¹¹²⁻¹¹⁷ CBCF intern Mark Mitchell, MD, MPH, wrote to CBCF executive director Frank Morris expressing concern that smoking was especially harmful to blacks and requesting that the CBCF policy board reconsider the practice of allowing cigarette distribution at its events.

“I am very much disturbed by the [CBCF’s] policy of promoting cigarette smoking . . . I am requesting that you raise these issues . . . in the hope that we will adopt a policy more in line with . . . the well-being of Black Americans . . . Cigarette promotions have been highly successful in coercing Black people to begin smoking . . . Yet CBCF has not discouraged smoking. On the contrary[,] it is encouraging more Blacks to smoke.”¹¹⁸

It is unclear whether the CBCF board saw the Mitchell letter, but executive director Morris forwarded a copy to Norm Gaines, the RJR representative who supplied cigarettes for the CBCF events,¹¹⁹ noting:

“One of our scholars . . . contends that there is evidence to show that heavy cigarette smoking by Black Americans [note: nowhere in Dr Mitchell’s memo is there a reference to “heavy cigarette smoking”] is having a disproportionately negative impact on the health of Black Americans . . . We want to hear all sides of this issue and to see whether you or the Tobacco Institute has any information on the impact of cigarette smoking upon Black Americans.”¹²⁰

We were unable to locate a reply from Gaines, but an unsigned letter in the Tobacco Institute collection dated August 1984 appears to be a prepared response to Morris’s request. Although the industry had known since the 1950s that smoking is associated with cancer,¹²¹ the letter asserts:

“To draw a conclusion that smoking causes certain chronic diseases and other adverse health conditions in blacks . . . is not justified in our view.”¹²²

Despite Dr Mitchell’s attempt to intervene, tobacco presence continued at CBCF events. In 1987, three years after Dr Mitchell’s letter, CBC members Julian Dixon and Mickey Leland asked PM for $75 000 and a three year commitment to sponsor the CBCF Annual Legislative Weekend’s fashion shows.¹²³ Although the congressmen said they “[looked] forward to the opportunity to reciprocate in the very near future”, their request was initially denied because PM marketing executives felt that attendees at the CBCF fashion shows “[did] not represent a target franchise for product promotion or publicity”.¹²⁴ However, because the industry was then fighting the excise tax battles, CBC support was strategically important. Corporate office pressure led PM to sponsor the CBCF events after all, for reasons revealed in a memo from Stanley Scott, vice president of public affairs, to Ellen Merlo, vice president of marketing services.

“ . . . I received correspondence from our . . . Federal Relations office in Washington urging me to contact four members of the Congressional Black Caucus on the critical issue of proposed increased excise taxes . . . In view of this direct request from the Black Caucus leadership and the ongoing Philip Morris political support of this constituency . . . I urge reconsideration of your decision in this [sponsorship] matter.”⁴⁶

The CBC solicited Philip Morris to financially support the fashion shows, but did not want cigarette brand support publicised.^{125 126} Philip Morris, expecting visibility and an opportunity to promote its Virginia Slims brand,¹²⁷ instead met resistance:

“ . . . the program cover for the . . . fashion show will now not include “presented by Virginia Slims” . . . and [with] the Caucus unhappiness with being associated with a cigarette brand, we have lost all Virginia Slims presence at the event.”¹²⁵

RJR was also experiencing resistance from Johnson Publications, publisher of Ebony and Jet magazines, regarding promotion of MORE cigarettes at the Ebony fashion shows. Due to public pressure, Ebony suspended its affiliation with the cigarette.³ A memo from RJR’s EM Blackmer, vice president of marketing operations, to Benjamin Ruffin noted:

“ . . . the MORE Brand has been involved with the Ebony Fashion Fair for a number of years . . . We have been frustrated by our attempts to develop a stronger association between the MORE Brand and the Fashion Fair event. Johnson has responded that they do not wish to give the impression that RJR is “sponsoring” the activity.”¹²⁸

Defusing opposition from within African American communities

Courting leaders helped the industry defuse potential opposition. A 1982 internal industry study suggested that African American leaders were least likely to support actions against companies “having good records of black-related employment practices and support of black community activities”.³⁰ In the late 1980s, as black tobacco control activists were becoming more vocal, the industry used black leaders to counter their efforts.

For example, when the industry was criticised for advertising targeting minorities, it fought back with Benjamin Hooks, executive director of the NAACP. In 1989, Hooks (listed as a candidate for the industry’s speaker program⁹⁶) publicly defended tobacco companies against the charges of targeting. In an article “What about individual choice?”, Hooks noted increased critical attention to tobacco advertising practices. He wrote:

“Implicit in this is the premise that Blacks are so naïve they will be persuaded to smoke by a billboard or an ad . . . This is an insidious form of paternalism. Blacks, like the rest of the populace, can make the choice of whether to smoke or not.”¹²⁹

In January 1990, RJR attempted to test market in Philadelphia a new mentholated cigarette called Uptown.¹³⁰ Convinced that this represented targeting of African Americans,^{4 131} enraged community leaders organised opposition.^{132 133} Federal Health and Human Services Secretary Louis W Sullivan publicly denounced RJR.¹³⁴ In an unsigned RJR response to Dr Sullivan on 18 January 1990, the industry again allied itself with Hooks:

“I received your letter asking us to cancel our plans to test market . . . Uptown . . . I am particularly distressed by the paternalistic tone . . . We do not agree with the implication that black consumers are less capable than others of making the personal decision of whether or not to smoke . . . We share this opinion with Dr. Benjamin L. Hooks, executive director of the NAACP.¹³⁵

On 19 January 1990, the NAACP released its public statement on the Uptown marketing campaign. Hooks, in a carefully worded statement, said:

"As an organization deeply rooted in the black community, we at the NAACP are aware that the decision of the R.J. Reynolds Company to single out this community as the target of its marketing efforts on behalf of . . . "Uptown", is being broadly perceived in a negative manner . . . the NAACP will seek a meeting to express our concerns with company officials."¹³⁶

Hooks wrote privately to James Johnston, RJR president/CEO, requesting a meeting. Hooks wrote, ". . . great concern exists about the apparent "targeting" of cigarette marketing to the black community . . . I am requesting an opportunity to meet with you . . . for a discussion of this matter, which is of great importance to both of us."¹³⁷ Although Hooks' letter emphasised the matter's "importance," he did not publicly oppose Uptown. In fact, in a Time Magazine interview he was implicitly critical of "Uptown opponents", arguing that they had adopted "the rationale that blacks are not capable of making their own free choices".¹³² An RJR memo written before Uptown's introduction shows that the industry considered Hooks a reliable ally.

"Should protest from the black community . . . reach a point where broad national response is necessary . . . Ask Ben Hooks and others within the black community to host lunches, breakfasts, or other events with their constituents."¹³⁸

On 19 January, due to public pressure, RJR cancelled Uptown.^{139 140} Hooks, frequently quoted by other industry spokespersons,¹⁴¹⁻¹⁴⁵ was later lauded by RJR as a "friend and supporter who was one of few individuals to say anything positive on [RJR's] behalf in the wake of Uptown."¹⁴⁶ Hazel Dukes, president of the New York state conference of NAACP branches, was another NAACP tobacco industry ally.^{147 148} As a member of the Committee for Common Courtesy, an industry front group,¹⁴⁹ she actively promoted tobacco interests²¹ by opposing clean air policies in New York City.¹⁵⁰⁻¹⁵⁴ The industry also used its alliances to counter critics more generally. Accusing industry opponents of racism was suggested as an effective industry strategy in an RJR document from 1990 that discusses a meeting held to discuss possible coalitions between the cigarette and beer industries. The document suggests themes for a campaign to counter industry critics, including "our critics are elitist and racist".¹⁵⁵

DISCUSSION

Others have previously described the tobacco industry's influence in the African American community, noting that tobacco money, especially in earlier periods, supported organisations that might otherwise have failed for lack of funding.^{3 7 156} The full extent of the tobacco industry's financial presence remains unseen¹⁵⁷ and is probably underestimated here, since given the voluminous nature of the document collections, we cannot assure that we have examined all potentially relevant documents. However, the internal industry documents now allow us to understand better the underlying reasons why some of this support was provided.

What this study illustrates is that the tobacco industry has for decades meticulously cultivated relationships with virtually every leader and leadership group within the African

What this paper adds

Among all racial and ethnic groups in the USA, African Americans bear the greatest burden from tobacco related disease. The tobacco industry has been highly influential in the African American community for decades, providing funding and other resources to community leaders and emphasising publicly its support for civil rights causes and groups, while ignoring the negative health effects of its products on those it claims to support. However, the industry's private business reasons for providing such support were hitherto unknown.

This analysis of previously secret internal tobacco industry documents provides for the first time a clearer picture of the tobacco industry's practices and purposes in establishing strong relationships with the African American community. The industry established relationships with virtually every African American leader and organisation for three specific business reasons: to increase African American tobacco use, to use African Americans as a frontline force to defend industry policy positions, and to defuse tobacco control efforts. This paper provides detailed documentation of these purposes. As the tobacco industry expands globally, public health advocates should anticipate similar industry efforts to exploit the vulnerabilities of other marginalised groups.

American community, and that this effort was expended not merely out of generosity, but for at least three specific business reasons: to develop and increase tobacco use among African Americans; to use African Americans as a frontline force to advance and defend industry policy positions; and to defuse or obstruct tobacco control efforts arising from both within and outside the community.

The African American community, like other marginalised communities recognised as strategically important to the industry, has in some instances sought out and benefited from tobacco industry financial support estimated at $25 million yearly.¹⁵⁷ Some might argue that the relationships have been mutually instrumental, since African American groups received needed support in exchange for their backing of pro-tobacco legislation or their silence on health issues. However, given the now widely acknowledged, disproportionately destructive impact of tobacco use on African Americans, the price extracted from the community in pain, suffering, sickness, early death, and loss of community elders may outweigh financial gains. At $25 million a year, the 45 000 African Americans who die annually from preventable tobacco related diseases are figuratively traded for a mere $555 apiece.

The tobacco industry regards African Americans as a group with particular historic, social, and economic vulnerabilities,¹⁵⁸ and it exploits these vulnerabilities by attempting to portray addiction to cigarettes as a civil right and a free choice. By providing monetary and social recognition, the industry also suggests a picture of inclusion and friendship. However, it chooses to ignore the devastating impact of its products on the very group of people it claims to support.

The tobacco industry's relationships with the African American community also suggest patterns of activity that may be repeated as the industry expands its global reach. It can be anticipated that where racial or ethnic divisions create groups that are marginalised, yet constitute potential markets, opportunities for well publicised corporate philanthropy, or emerging political power blocs, the tobacco industry may attempt to exploit groups' marginalisation by providing resources and recognition. In turn, such groups may develop economic dependence on tobacco funding and reluctance to challenge industry practices.

Conclusion

The pervasive presence of the tobacco industry among all spheres of leadership in the African American community suggests that special public health challenges remain. The first steps, calling attention from within the community to the harms caused by tobacco and questioning the continued normalisation of tobacco use implied in accepting tobacco promotions and money, have already been undertaken. The next steps are harder, because they involve overtly confronting the economic chokehold developed by the industry, publicising the harms caused by continuing to permit it, holding leaders accountable, and considering alternative sources of funds. Only the community itself can decide whether certain leaders, organisations and/or activities are truly worth the hidden price the community pays to sustain them with tobacco industry dollars.
